GARDNER'S

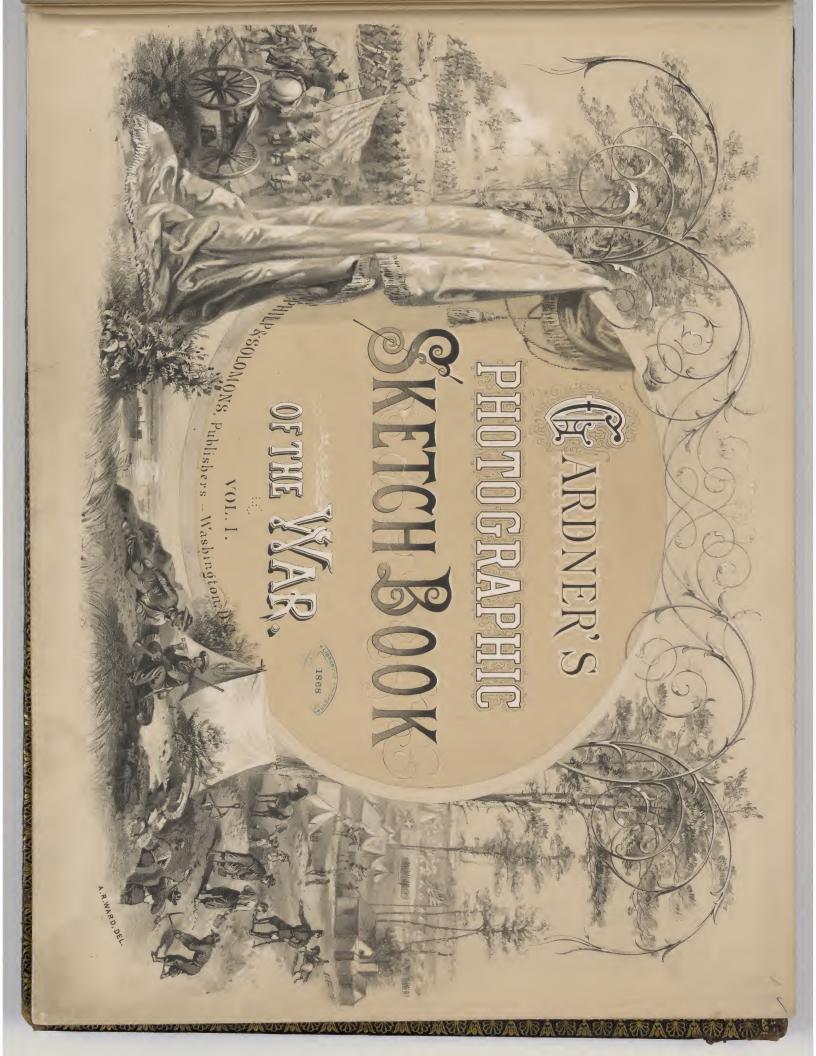

OF THE WAR

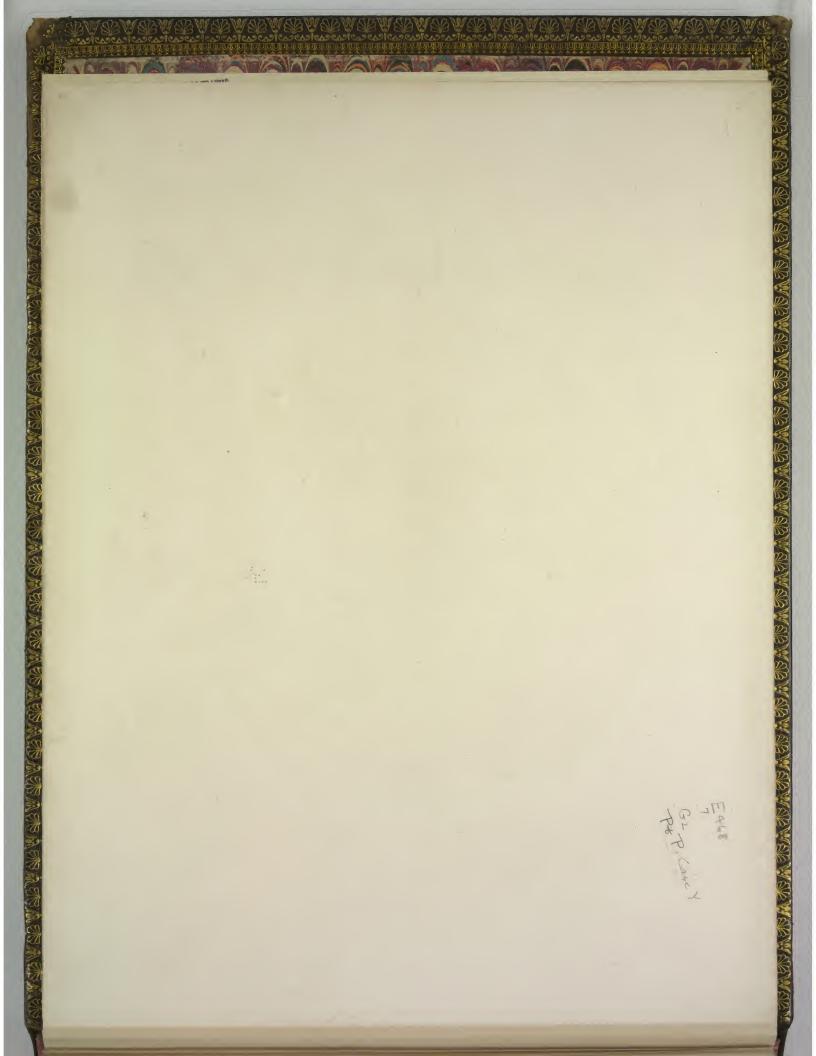

PROPERTY OF PRINTS & PHOTOGRAPHS
DIVISION
LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

+4-367

omission, therefore, of any remarks by way of preface might well be justified: and yet, perhaps, a few introductory words may not be amiss. In presenting the Photographic Sketch Book of the War to the attention of the public, it is designed that it shall speak for itself. The enduring interest. Localities that would scarcely have been known, and probably never remembered, save in their immediate vicinity, have become had espoused. celebrated, and will ever be held sacred as memorable fields, where thousands of brave men yielded up their lives a willing sacrifice for the cause they As mementoes of the fearful struggle through which the country has just passed, it is confidently hoped that the following pages will possess an collection from which these views have been selected amounts to nearly three thousand. accepted by posterity with an undoubting faith. During the four years of the war, almost every point of importance has been photographed, and the Verbal representations of such places, or seenes, may or may not have the merit of accuracy; but photographic presentments of them will be Contents of Volume Eirst.

- 1. Marshall House, Alexandria.
- 2. Slave Pen, Alexandria.
- 3. Fairfax Court-House
- 4. Stone Church, Centreville.
- 5. Fortifications on Heights of Centreville.
- 6. Quaker Guns, Centreville.
- 7. Ruins of Stone Bridge, Bull Run.
- 8. Mathews House, Battle-field of Bull Run.
- 9. Ruins at Manassas.
- 10. Ruins at Manassas Junction
- 11. Fortifications at Manassas.
- 12. Battery No. 1, near Yorktown-No. 1.
- 13. Battery No. 1, near Yorktown—No. 2.
- 14. Battery No. 4, near Yorktown.
- 15. Moore House, Yorktown, where Cornwallis signed the Capitulation.
- 16. Camp at Cumberland Landing, on the Pamunkey.
- 17. Military Bridge across the Chickahominy.
- 18. Ruins of Norfolk Navy Yard.
- 19. Antietam Bridge, on Boonsboro and Sharpsburg Turnpike.
- 20. Burnside Bridge, across Antietam Creek.
- 21. Dunker Church, Battle-field of Antietam.
- 22. Signal Tower, Elk Mountain, overlooking Battle-field of Antietam
- 23. President Lincoln on Battle-field of Antietam.
- 24. Scene in Pleasant Valley, foot of South Mountain, Maryland
- 25. Pontoon Bridge, across the Potomac at Berlin.

- Meeting of the Shenandoah and Potomac, at Harper's Ferry.
- 7. What do I want, John Henry?—scene near Warrenton.
- 28. Scouts and Guides to the Army of the Potomac.
- 29. Lacy House, Falmouth, Virginia.
- 30. Fredericksburg, Virginia.
- 31. Battery D, 2d U. S. Artillery, in action.
- 32. Pontoon Bridge, across the Rappahannock
- 33. Evacuation of Aquia Creek.
- 34. Group of Confederate Prisoners, Fairfax Court-House.
- 35. Gettysburg, Pennsylvania.
- 36. A Harvest of Death, Battle-field of Gettysburg.
- 37. Field where General Reynolds fell, Battle of Gettysburg.
- 38. Interior of Breastworks on Round Top, Battle-field of Gettysburg.
- 39. Gateway of Cemetery, Gettysburg.
- 40. A Sharpshooter's Last Sleep, on Battle-field of Gettysburg
- 41. Home of a Rebel Sharpshooter, Battle-field of Gettysburg.
- 2. Trossel's House, Battle-field of Gettysburg.
- 43. Headquarters Maj. Gen. George G. Meade, during Battle of Gettysburg.
- 44. Slaughter Pen, foot of Round Top, Battle-field of Gettysburg.
- 45. Studying the Art of War, scene at Fairfax Court-House.
- 46. Provost Marshal's Office, Aquia Creek.
- 47. Castle Murray, near Auburn, Virginia.
- 48. Culpeper, Virginia.
- 49. General Post-Office, Army of the Potomac
- The Halt, scene near ('ulpeper.

The Marshall House, Alexandria, Wirginia.

and fitted it up for business, so changing the interior as to be scarcely recognizable by those who visited it in 1861 furniture, and window shutters, and cut away the whole of the staircase and door where Ellsworth was shot. Finally Northern men took possession of the building hours, until measures could be taken to prevent them from destroying the city, which it was feared they would attempt in revenge for the killing of their commander instantly killed Jackson, and with others hurried to Washington with Ellsworth's remains. The intelligence of his death was kept from the Zouaves for several by Private Brownell, the Colonel went up through the building after the flag, and on coming down was shot on the stair-case by the proprietor, Jackson. Brownell daylight, and as Col. Ellsworth was posting his troops about the town, he discovered a Confederate flag waving from the roof of the Marshall House. Accompanied was in this building that Col. Ellsworth of the New York Fire Zouaves was killed, in May, 1861. Our troops had surprised and captured the city just before Brownell was shortly after appointed a lieutenant in the regular army. Relic hunters soon carried away from the hotel everything moveable, including the carpets. The Marshall House, at the commencement of the war, was a dingy old hotel, kept by a man generally known in that section by the name of Jim Jackson. It

MARSHALL HOUSE, ALEXANDRIA, YIRGINIA.

Sladie Ben, Alexandria. Wirginia.

of the firm and the overseers. The high brick wall enclosed a court yard, in which were stables and outhouses for the accommodation of planters who come in for and personal attractions an able-bodied man at from one thousand to eighteen hundred dollars. A woman would bring from five hundred to fifteen hundred dollars, according to her ago held over the servants as security for faithful labor and good behavior. Before the war, a child three years old, would sell, in Alexandria, for about fifty dollars, and limbs of those suspected of designs for escape. Auction sales were regularly held, at which Virginia farmers disposed of their servants to cotton and sugar planters the purpose of selling or purchasing slaves. The large building on the right was used for the confinement of the negroes. It had a number of apartments, in photograph was situated in the western suburbs of Alexandria, near the depot of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad. The main building was used by the clerks from the Gulf States. If a slave-owner needed money which he could not easily procure, he sold one of his slaves; and the threat of being sent South was constantly were very strong, and were secured by large locks and bolts. Iron bars were fixed in the masonry of the windows, and manacles were frequently placed on the which the slaves could be kept singly or in gangs, and one large mess room, where they received their food. The establishment was essentially a prison. The doors In many of the Southern cities the people had erected buildings of this kind for the confinement of slaves awaiting sale. The establishment represented in the

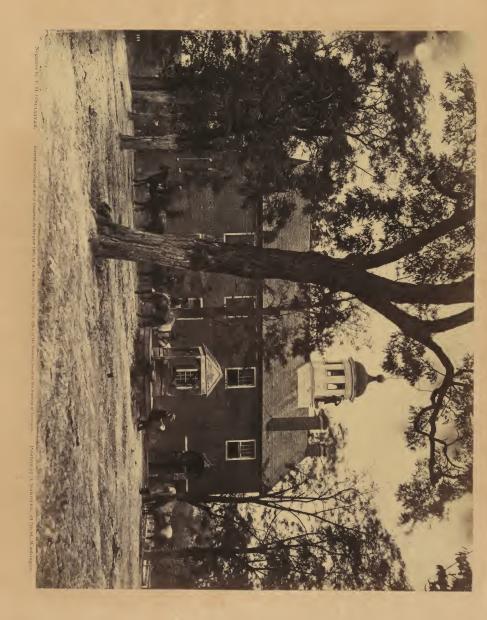

SLAVE PEN, ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA

ugust, 1862

Knirfax Courf-Youse.

by the soldiery. Generals McClellan and Hooker each temporarily had their headquarters here when in command of the Army of the Potomac, as did also the great number of these were carried off by curiosity hunters in the sacking which took place in September, 1862, and a still greater number were ruthlessly destroyed kept here were of great historical interest, dating from the early settlement of Virginia, and including many documents in the writing of General Washington. A the time of secession, from which it was the first to suffer. Each of the many commands which occupied the town during the war added to the work of devastation about three thousand inhabitants, with three large hotels, two fine churches, and a flourishing female institute, the place had become of considerable importance at lamented Sumner, and other officers of equal rank. The battle-field of Bull Run is ten miles distant, and Chantilly, where the gallant Kearney and Stephens fell. sides of the building for riflemen and troops stationed in it to repel any attack that might be made by guerillas who constantly hovered in the vicinity. The records then into stables, while the venerable Court-House was stripped of its wood-work, leaving only the naked walls and roof. In 1864, loop-holes were cut through the commenced in 1861, and long before peace was announced its comeliness had departed. Its best houses were burned, the churches were converted into hospitals, and The village of Fairfax Court-House, Virginia, eighteen miles from Washington, was, previous to the rebellion, one of the lovellest of the State. Numbering it ever knew before. House is being put in order for the occupation of the courts, and, under the influence of Northern enterprise, the town promises soon to wear even more beauty than The village is now, however, rapidly recovering from its misfortunes. Shattered houses have been repaired, families are returning to their homes, the Court-

FAIRFAX COURT-Hous

De Thean

Stone Church, Centreville.

+ 0 +

Capital. Guerillas have swarmed about it, cavalry have charged over its untilled fields, and demoralized divisions have bivouacked for roll-call behind its hills. as a rock of strength in his fierce struggle back from Cedar Mountain, and again, in 1863, Meade turned his columns towards its ridges for a bulwark to defend the after their weary march to assault the position of the enemy, and here his rear-guard checked the returning tide of half-beaten Confederates. Pope next sought it of both armies slumber, and the spot now only interests the visitor because of the wreck that has come upon it. Here the divisions of McDowell gathered strength of the churches. Searcely a vestige of its former self remains. Redoubts and riflepits stretch along its knolls; graves, half hidden by the grass, tell where the dead hospitality to welcome the stranger. War crushed it, piled earthworks upon its ruins to protect hostile camps, built cantonments in its gardens, and made hospitals doors that creaked in their old age, and fences that straggled every way, but there was always an odor of wild roses and honey-suckle about it, and a genial Centreville had smiled on many generations, and grown feeble with all its pleasant things about it. The houses were leaning structures with huge stone chimneys Percues upon the gentle slope of the ridge that bears its name, and looking across fertile fields to the mountains that rise up grandly hiding the West, place of their fathers, and, with returning peace, the husbandman finds that nature has not forgotten its fruitfulness in the years of war and devastation. Through all these scenes a few of its people have lived and suffered, faithful to their homes. Others are turning back from uncertain wanderings to the resting assault. In front the fields sloped down to a stream about five hundred yards distant, along which grew dense thickets of vines, underbrush, and thorn bushes. than field batteries to this line. Redoubts, lunettes, and rifle-pits were so constructed as to command each other, and to render any portion of the works, if captured Beyond were forests, which had been leveled, in order to perfect the range of the artillery, the fallen trees forming a barrier through which it would be impossible to shown in the photograph were constructed near the village of Centreville, and, by the topography of the surrounding country, were rendered almost impregnable to by an assaulting column, untenable. In the rear of these defences, on the western slope of the ridge, the Confederates had their cantonments. move a line of troops. The Confederates never had any guns heavier than twelve pounders in these works, it being extremely difficult to move any other artillery AFTER the first battle of Bull Run, the Confederates extended their earthworks from Manassas across Bull Run, and along the ridge of Centreville. The works now a wilderness, overgrown with bushes, rank weeds, and running briars. herds, and bounded beyond by the mountains which rose up so boldly as to seem but half a dozen miles away. All this section was devastated by the armies, and is here and there smiling to each other over the forests. Looking west the eye rested on a fertile valley, watered by countless streams, dotted with farm-houses and The view from the crest of the works was very fine. To the east was a wide area of undulating country, covered with dense woods, and with grassy hill-sides

STONE CHURCH, CENTREVILLE, VA.

Fortifications on the Beights of Centreville.

Auaher Kuns, Centrebille.

each. The fort in the foreground has a revetoment or lining of rude hurdle work, to keep the earth from crumbling down, a very necessary precaution with the guns, and bogus figures on guard duty, that it was several days before the rebels ventured to approach them. These Centreville works, in consequence of their followed, meeting with a repulse from Gen. Warren, at Bristow Station, and declining the proffered battle at Centreville, fell back to the Rapidan, destroying the whole commanding the natural glacis, gently descending for half a mile to the little stream called Rocky Run, and the opposite slope, to its crest half a mile distant natural advantages, were almost impregnable to attack. The rifle-pits covering the crest of the hill were strengthened at intervals with embrasured forts, the uncommon thing to place them upon deserted positions. Our soldiers, at the evacuation of Harrison's Landing, left the works so well supplied with "Quaker" Capt. Porter, then commanding the First Massachusetts Light Battery, found in one park the tracks of ten batteries. As for the "Quakers," it was not at all an railroad as he retreated heights that Gen. Meade returned with the Army of the Potomac, after it had been reduced by the transfer of the Eleventh and Twelfth Corps to the West. Lee Virginia soil. The board platforms show where guns have formerly been in position, commanding the approaches from Fairfax Court-House. It was to these The huts in the distance were a portion of the rebel cantonments, numbering in all about fifteen hundred log cabins, calculated to contain from eight to twenty men that the rebel lines at Centreville were never defended by any others; yet the rebels had in position there at least seven heavy siege guns and numerous field batteries. These were found in the works at Centreville, after the position at Manassas Junction was evacuated by the rebels. It was claimed, and is believed by many, of Gen. Pope in 1862, and hundreds of acres still bear evidences of those fearful scenes for their services, when Johnston's reinforcements from Winchester suddenly appeared in rear of our right, and threw our lines into utter confusion. A feeble the bridge, which soon became obstructed by wagons, and to prevent pursuit by the enemy was destroyed. A portion of this ground was fought over in the battles great confusion from the field, and occupying the turnpike. 'The fighting had nearly ceased, and Gen. McDowell was expressing his thanks to some of his officers Heintzelman, and Tyler, who had crossed the bridge, attacked the enemy, and the engagement became general; our forces, after a severe struggle, driving him in who immediately disposed his forces to meet it by extending them obliquely across the turnpike, facing the bridge, at a distance of about two miles. Hunter, and the entire portion shown in the sketch occupied by the Confederates. It was expected that Hunter and Heintzelman would strike the left of the enemy at ten miles, and by a flank movement surprise and overwhelm the enemy while occupied with the two other divisions. The country at that time was densely wooded. attempt was made to repulse the attack, but the regiments rapidly broke to pieces, and forming a mass of terror-stricken fugitives, rushed from the field down across daylight on the 21st, but owing to unforeseen obstacles, failed to reach the designated point until after ten o'clock. This delay revealed the movement to Beauregard. the passage of the bridge, Miles to make a demonstration at Blackburn's Ford, two miles below, and the divisions of Hunter and Heintzleman to move up the stream 18,000 of whom were engaged. Virginia, where the enemy has a large force." General McDowell commenced operations with the divisions of Tyler, Hunter, Heintzelman, and Miles—33,000 men; intended to turn the position, force the enemy from the road, that it may be re-opened, and, if possible, destroy the railroad leading from Manasses to the Valley of guarded, whether with artillery or not, is not positively known, but every indication favors the belief that he proposes to defend the passage of the stream. It is Bull Run; has seized the stone bridge, and made a heavy abatis on the right bank, to oppose our advance in that direction. The ford above the bridge is also Beauregard. In a general order, issued on the 20th, Gen. McDowell said: "The enemy has planted a battery on the Warrenton turnpike to defend the passage of This sketch represents a portion of the field of the battle of Bull Run, fought on the 21st of July, 1861, by the forces under Gen. McDowell and Gen. The strength of the enemy was about the same, and was all engaged. The plan of the attack was for Tyler's division to threaten

QUAKER GUNS, GENTREVILLE, VIRGINIA.

Ruins of Stone Bridge, Bull Kun, Virginia.

RUINS OF STONE BRIDGE, BULL RUN.

88184-10,20

The Mathen's House.

McDowell's acquaintances that he never indulges in spirituous liquors in any form. The photograph sets at rest the idle story, based upon the supposed non-existence existence of a stream at that place, cited this statement of the General as evidence of his alleged intoxication on the day of the battle. It is well known by Gen. artillery fire in that engagement, its inmates were driven out, and the walls badly damaged. The hill in front of the house was the scene of the most desperate him until he was exchanged. months, where he would undoubtedly have perished but for the faithful nursing of his wife, who obtained permission to pass through the lines, and remained with This shattered dwelling stands on the first Bull Run battle ground, by the side of the turnpike leading from Centreville to Warrenton. Subjected to a severe There Ricketts and Griffin lost their guns, the former receiving a severe wound, and falling into the hands of the enemy, who kept him in prison several The little stream shown in the picture was referred to by Gen. McDowell in his report, and a number of officers, who denied the to their ruined house, and impoverished by the war, live in great destitution. Everything except the stone walls and roof of the building was swept away. Barns, outhouses, and fences were destroyed, and the whole country presents the appearance of utter desolation The Bull Run Monument, consecrated with imposing ceremonies in June, 1865, stands about half a mile from the house. The Mathews family have returned

Manassas Junction, Wirginia, March, 1862.

of the rebel army, which, like the Arabs, had folded its tents, and silently stolen away. Manassas Junction was but a level plain, as seen by the photograph, and Orange and Alexandria Road, at that period. A few mud huts, and about fifty broken down wagons, and the usual debris of a winter's camp, were the sole remnants depot, machine and repair shops, &c. Everything was destroyed, except half a dozen cars, which contained flour and some camp equipage of a South Carolina that all the trains had gone. Two, however, had not left, and these were at once fired, together with the surrounding buildings, used by the Railroad Company for Brigade, and which for some reason escaped the conflagration. The old wooden turn-table was uninjured, and is a fair sample of the old fashioned equipage of the Richmond. It was orderly and well conducted for several days, but as the last trains were leaving, some of the soldiers fired a bridge south of the junction, supposing with neither natural or artificial works of any strength, the fortifications at that time consisting only of rude mud banks EARLY in March, 1862, the rebel army, under Gen. Johnson, evacuated Centreville and Manassas, (their Northern line,) and commenced a retreat towards

RUINS AT MANASSAS JUNCTION

191-7197

B8171 - 7197

Manassas Aunction.

abandonment. The scene of devastation after the evacuation was terrible. Of the pleasant village only tottering chimneys were left, surrounded by blackened ruins, nearly overwhelmed by the attack of July 21, 1861, remained increasing in strength until March, 1862, when the movements of General McClellan compelled its the Southern levies were hastened immediately after the fall of Sumter, and the village of half a dozen houses soon became the centre of a vast camp, which, though precipitous bluffs, no better place could have been selected by the Confederates for a permanent camp from which to harrass an enemy or repel attack. To this point smoked in all directions, presenting one wide area of desolation, but a small portion of which can be represented in a single photograph and the debris of half-burned cars and storehouses. once by its remarkable strength as a military position. High table land, flanked by dense woods, and bounded on all sides by deep, treacherous streams, or Maxasas, the junction of the Orange and Alexandria and Manassas Gap Railroads, twenty-seven miles from Alexandria, strikes the attention of the visitor at The forts were dismantled, broken wagons were strewn over the fields, and quartermaster and commissary stores

Bull Run, Gainesville, and Groveton, within a few minutes drive, will forever attract the tourist to this spot spring much of that which disfigured the landscape utterly disappeared. The view of the adjacent country from this point is very fine, and the historic fields of Such material as had not been wholly destroyed by the fire was speedily removed by the (tovernment. Pederal camps were established, and with the return of Forfitications at Manassas.

B 9184-1051

works to sloping mounds, over which the farmer's plow is already turning the furrow entirely disappeared. scarcity in the South rather than to confidence in the natural strength of the position. The fortifications are now rapidly being leveled, and in a few years will have have proved far more serviceable in repelling the attack than artillery, although there is no doubt that the small number of heavy cannon was attributable to their and the almost impenetrable thickets bordering Bull Run, the works did not require very heavy ordnance. Had they been assaulted, the musket and bayonet would pounder field batteries, with a few old fashioned thirty-twos, brought from the Norfolk Navy Yard. Located, however, upon high table-land, bounded by ravines this position were the ridges and earthworks of Centreville, extending the line to nearly fifteen miles. The armament consisted principally of six and twelvevery little resistance to artillery. The flooring was laid for the use of the guns, the four short posts marking the embrasure. The interior of the works was badly resist the authority of the Government. The casks were filled with earth, and were intended to supply the lack of more suitable gabions, but would have offered Beauregard, well known as an engineer of great ability; but their construction illustrates the inexperience in military matters of the men who rallied at this spot to drained, and the trenches were almost constantly filled with stagnant water. This sketch represents a portion of the Confederete fortifications at Manassas after their occupation by the Federal Army. The works were laid out by General The soil composing them is of a light character, and washes away in every rain, filling up the ditches and reducing the sharply defined The fortifications formed a semi-circle about four miles in length, but contiguous to

FORTIFICATIONS AT MANASSAS.

March, 1 6

Baktery Aumber Bue, bekore Fartitolun, Wirginin, 1862.

NO. 1

earth. On the top of these were piled bags of sand, and the whole sodded, making an embankment of thirty feet thick in front of the guns. The enemy fired a number of solid shot and shell into this bank from an English sixty-four rifled gun, but none of them did any damage, or entered over ten feet into the earth. dirt thrown out of the excavation was banked up in front of the guns, and kept from falling in by wicker baskets, constructed by the Engineer Corps, and filled with Confederate's wharves and their main works in front of Yorktown. It was built by the First Connecticut artillery, Col. Tyler, and had six of the heaviest rifled guns ever James river, across the narrow neck of the Peninsula, in front of Yorktown. The first battery was located on the York river, about a mile and three-quarters from fired once in fifteen minutes. The muzzles of the guns were about five feet from the ground, and the bottom of the carriages about ten feet below the surface. The mounted in a land battery, namely, one 200-pound Parrott and five 100-pounders. The guns were mounted on heavy wrought-iron carriages, and could only be When Gen. McClellan undertook to capture the confederate army on the Peninsula by seige, he commenced to construct a line of works from the York to the the 100-pounders dropping into a confederate camp and exploding before the men could scatter. fallen two miles beyond their works, or four miles from the battery. Nineteen men were killed and wounded at a distance of three miles by a single shell of bombardment was ever attempted by it. On riding through the confederate works, the next morning after the retreat, it was found that shells from this battery had movements there was a broadside into some of their schooners, which were unloading supplies at the wharf-front of Yorktown, nearly two niles distant. One shot left, and ran up the York river out of sight. Occasional shots were fired from this battery, at various intervals, up to the time of the enemy's departure, but no regular tore through the rigging of a schooner, and another exploded close by, throwing an immense sheet of water into the air over the vessels. In a few minutes they all The work was built in a grove of peach trees, on a small promontory which ran out into the York river, and the first intelligence the enemy had of our

on our side at this battery from the enemy's fire upon it. Experienced officers expressed the opinion that with this battery alone, the enemy could have been driven from their position in Yorktown. No lives were ever lost An immense magazine in the rear, was connected with the guns by an underground tunnel, through which the men could pass in carrying ammunition

Battery No. 1, Near Yorktown, Yirginia.

Battern Rumber One, before Forhfohm, Virginia, 1862.

NO. 2

might not be the result if all opened. This earthwork was occupied by the Zonaves, Fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, commanded by Colonel, afterwards largely to the reasons for evacuating the stronghold, there can be no doubt, the rebels wisely reasoning that if one battery could accomplish so much, what deadly fire of this artillery, burst one of their largest rifle guns, with fatal effect upon the cannoniers. That the fire of battery "NUMBER ONE" contributed and was so completely concealed behind the little crest rising from the shore of the York river, as to be quite undistinguishable from the enemy's lines, except when the smoke of the guns revealed its existence. The ordnance consisted of five 100-pounders, and one of 200, all Parrot guns. The rebels, in trying to return the This, the best constructed of all the works thrown up for the bombardment of the rebel lines, was built in the orchard of the Farinholt House, near Yorktown, their part to be chosen for an exhibition of military proficiency when distinguished visitors came to see the troops at the front. On one of these occasions they had On Federal Hill, in Baltimore, they built the strong fort of that name, thus acquiring a knowledge of engineering, and, in addition to a wonderful precision in the to go through the exercises encumbered by heavy overcoats, rendered necessary by the unpresentable condition of their red breeches. manual and bayonet exercise, were well drilled in the use of heavy and light artillery. Attached to the division of regulars in the Fifth Corps, their record has been almost without comparison, as good and staunch soldiers. New York may well be proud of them. While in camp at Baltimore they acquired under that officer the magnificent drill and soldierly bearing they afterwards showed upon so many battle-fields. As a proof of their standing in the army, it was invariably upon the lines at Gloucester Point, and the fortifications on this side. Schooners, constantly coming and going, brought ammunition and stores to the wharves at Yorktown, and occasionally the battery participated, at long range, in engagements brought on by gunboats venturing too far up the river. The Farinholt House commands a fine view of the river up to Yorktown, and Gloucester opposite. With a spy-glass it was easy to overlook the rebels working

The oysters of the York are celebrated for their excellence. In front of this house is one of the finest oyster beds in the river.

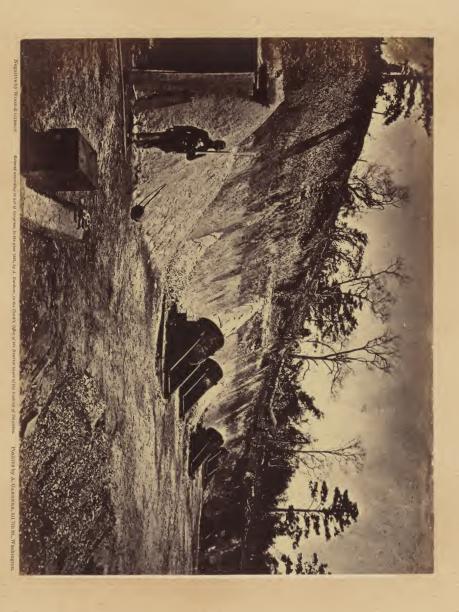

BATTERY NO. 1, NEAR YORKTOWN, YIRGINIA.

No Li

May, 100%

Morkar Bakkery Aumber Kour.

shells are directed, and accounts for the position of this Battery under the high bank. great labor to place them in position. As the fire of mortars is entirely a work of calculation, it is not necessary for the gunners to see the object against which the continuous, the troops remain under cover, unless absolutely required to man the works. The mortars of Battery No. 4 were of thirteen inch calibre, and required sentinel on the watch, to give warning of the approach of a shell, and enable every man to seek shelter till the explosion of the missile. If the bombardment is This represents one of the batteries planted for the bombardment of Yorktown. In places subjected to mortar fire, the men construct bomb proofs, and place a

BATTERY No. 4, NEAR YORKTOWN, YIRGINIA.

NO. 14.

May, 1862

The Moore House, near Forhtoliu.

squirrel-shooters of Mississippi, who were driven to the exercise of great caution in their endeavors to retaliate upon the working parties Stealing amongst the trees, purple with the bloom of the peach, the riflemen would proceed, at the first glimpse of dawn, while yet the mist hung in the air, to the gunners upon the fortifications, the sturdy company of Massachusetts riflemen, called the Andrews Sharpshooters, proving themselves much surperior to the invested Yorktown, the Moore House was in excellent preservation. It was far from a safe habitation, the rebel shells striking it several times; one, in particular, is, however, generally believed that the draft there prepared, was signed in the trenches of Yorktown, over a mile away. When the Army of the Potomac take a position, they would not dare to leave till night extended her friendly cover. With their heavy, telescope-sighted, rifles, they made deadly work among few seconds before left the house. Much frequented was it by the sharpshooters, the orchard beyond offering fair opportunities to advance to the front unobserved entered through the wall, and exploding inside, did consideable damage. Some of McClellan's aids, who had been reconnoitring from the windows, had but a IN October, 1781, the commissioners appointed to arrange the terms of capitulation, between General Washington and Lord Cornwallis, met at this house. It

Moore House, Yorktown, Yirginia.

Camp at Cumberland Landing, an the Zamunhep.

strong arms rapidly discharged the cargoes of meat and bread into the waiting wagons. Prominent in the picture was the camp of General McClellan's continually passing to drink of its brackish waters. Along the shore piers formed of barges, side by side, were thronged by commissaries and their assistants, while division, closely compacted, they stretched away, until, in the distance, the white tents were mere specks against the dark frame of woods. On one side the slow river, converted the barren fields, as if by magic, into an immense city of tents. From the hill above Toller's house the scene was truly grand. Division after through the bottomless roads of the lower peninsula, with so much labor. headquarters, which had just narrowly escaped capture, through taking a wrong direction. Another striking object was the park of the pontoon boats drawn Pamunkey, like a mirror, reflected the immense fleet of tranports, with their convoy of gunboats. Winding among the tents, long strings of animals were AT Cumberland Landing, one of the most magnificent spectacles ever seen in the army was presented, when the combined forces, massed upon the bank of the life has almost passed away in open order, it is most likely that they are on inspection drill. Such pictures carry one into the very life of camp, and are particularly interesting now that that New York Volunteers, Warren's Zouaves, have encamped, and in front of them a regiment of infantry are drawn up in column of companies. of the farriers carelessly thrown on the ground beneath. In the middle-ground are some mules picketed around the wagons, hard-working, much-abused creatures, Past these, a cook sitting on a mess chest, close to the ashes of his fire, near which are the camp-kettles and a pile of firewood. and so humorous in their antics that they were often termed the comedians of the army. Further on, a guard, their muskets stacked and knapsacks laying around Our picture, interesting as it is, gives but a small portion of the gorgeous whole. The prominent object is a mud-bespattered forge, the knapsacks and blankets On the edge of the wood the Fifth As these are formed

Juspection of Troops at Cumberlanding, Pamunkey, Virginia.

Military Bridge, Across the Chickahoming,

most presented the character of a stream, the swamp being in some places all of a mile in width, and supporting on its treacherous surface a luxuriant growth. In OTHERWISE known by the name of its builder, and marked on the map, "Woodbury's Bridge." The picture is taken at a point where the accumulated waters the air seemed to be sufficeating with stagnation, while beneath the pall of mist, an immense orchestra of double-bass bull frogs kept up a continual din, which at for its tortuous course through the swamp. Its construction was necessarily rude, as rough, unhewn, and twisted logs formed the material. Down in the woods, and destroyed their labor, by converting the whole valley into a broad lake, whose waters, pressing through the length of the swamp carried everything irresistibly Duane's, Sumner's—Upper and Lower—Bottom's, and Railroad Bridges. The cutting of dams above, and heavy rains, stopped the workmen a number of times the depths of this morass, the home of almost every variety of Virginia reptiles, the soldiers worked several weeks, constructing the causeways known as New night drowned the rumble of the wagons over the cordurays limited facilities of re-crossing the Chickahominy would probably have led to the capture of the greater portion of the corps. the bridge; and it was claimed by the engineers that the weight of the men in crossing kept it in its place. If, in that fight, our troops had been defeated, the In this way, during the battle of Fair Oaks, Sumnor's troops had barely passed over, when the rapidly accumulated waters of the river carried away The Grape Vine Bridge was so called

MILITARY BRIDGE, ACROSS THE CHICKAHOMINY, VIRGINIA.

1 61

- 0.0

Ruins of Aorioli Aady Bard.

evacuated by the rebels, they did what additional damage they could to the Navy Yard and its docks. former shortly to go down before that formidable iron-clad, the Merrimac, which was fitted out at this yard. When the Merrimac was blown up, and Norfolk yard was in a blaze, as well as the old three-decker, the Pennsylvania, the Ohio, New York, &c. The Cumberland and Pawnee, proceeded to Hampton Roads, the extending over a space of nearly two hundred acres. The marines, as early as ten o'clock, had evacuated and fired their barracks, and soon after two A. M. the whole by some volunteers, landed at nine o'clock, threw the shot and small arms into the river, spiked the guns, and made arrangements for firing the shops and warehouses, Ox Saturday, the 23d of April, 1861, the questionable policy of destroying this Navy Yard was enforced. The crews of the Cumberland and Pawnee, assisted

Its accessibility made it a most convenient place as a depot for the North Atlantic blockading fleets, the James River flotilla, and Gen. Graham's army gunboats tonnage, not to mention hosts of sharp Clyde-built blockade runners, long, low, and raking, brought here by their successful captors, previous to being taken North for filled with vessels, including magnificent frigates and sloops-of-war, renowned in many exploits, as well as gun-boats and purchased vessels of every build and adjudication and translation into ships-of-war for the capture of their fellows. Some of the shops were rebuilt, and the place presented a curious spectacle of industry in the midst of ruin; while the constant arrivals kept the adjacent waters

RUINS OF NORFOLK NAVY YARD. YIRGINIA

Quantier, 10

LAE01- h3/89

N84-1030

Antickam Bridge Maryland.

are evident in the overturned stone wall, the shattered fences, and down-trodden appearance of the adjacent ground. On the night of the 16th of September, the although but little suggestive in its present sunny repose, of the strife which took place near it, on the day of the battle of Antietam. Traces of the engagement cavalry of the Army of the Potomac captured this bridge after a sharp fight, holding it until the infantry came up. The fire of our artillery, planted on the ridges near the bridge, was terrible, and at one time no doubt contributed principally to the success of our partially disordered lines in checking the headlong assaults of This structure crosses Antietam Creek on the turnpike leading from Boonesboro' to Sharpsburg, and is one of the memorable spots in the history of the war, ripened over the breasts of the fallen, and the ploughshare only now and then turns up a shot, as a relic of that great struggle. of the Potomac was encamped. Very little now remains to mark the adjacent fields as a battle ground. Honses and fences have been repaired, harvests have Waters, Gen. Meade had his headquarters for a number of days on a wooded ridge called the "Devil's Backbone," situated near this stream, along which the Army After Lee's second invasion of Maryland, which ended with the battle of Gettysburg, and the escape of his army into Virginia at Williamsport and Falling

ANTIETAM BRIDGE, MARYLAND

127

Copumber, 1785.

Burnside Bridge, Across Antictam Grech.

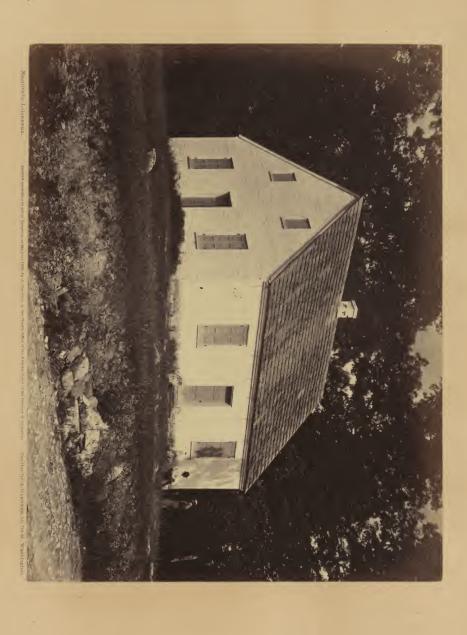

fringed with tangled bushes, form a most delightful valley, through which the miniature river, broken here and there by tiny cascades, hurries down to the Potomac ONE mile below Sharpsburg on Antietam Creek, a stone structure, known as the "Burnside Bridge," crosses the stream. Bold bluffs, crowned with oaks and

The Confederates were buried where they fell, and our own dead carefully interred in groups, which were enclosed with the material of fences overthrown in the again formed under a heavy artillery fire, and pushed forward into the standing corn, out of which a second line of Confederates suddenly arose and renewed the a murderous fire, through which it rapidly pressed, breaking over the lines of the enemy like a resistless wave, and sweeping him from the hillside. Here our troops the guns of the Confederates on the ridge in the back-ground. The assaulting column suffered heavily as it approached the bridge, and, in crossing, was expecsed to turn the enemy's right. As is partially shown by the photograph, the banks of the stream were very steep, and well defended by rifle pits which were covered by contest, which lasted for many hours, finally resulting in our victory. At the close of the fight the dead and wounded on the field here presented seemed countless. with the centre hotly engaged, the Confederates slowly forcing them back, while General Burnside, commanding the Ninth Corps, was ordered to carry this point and It was at this point that some of the most desperate fighting of the battle of Antietam occurred. The right of the Federal line was several miles above, and The stone wall extending from the bridge still bears evidences of the battle, and is the only monument of many gallant men who sleep in the meadow at

Dunker Church, Battle-Kield of Antiekam.

of the brigade, but most of the men had fallen in front of the cannon. completely obstructing the road with dead and wounded. Later in the day a Captain of this brigade was taken prisoner, and stated, that of the command of eighteen rear, took up a position with his four remaining pieces on a little knoll near a sunken road. The smoke obstructed the view considerably, and the Lieutenant not seeing and carried from the field, the command devolving on Lieutenant Stewart. Several of the horses had been killed, and Lieutenant Stewart, sending two guns to the hundred men which received that fire, but eighteen had returned to the division. Some of course had been taken prisoners or had wandered off after the annihilation rails into the mass of Confederates. The rear still pressed on, ignorant of the havoc in front, and again and again the artillery poured its iron hall into the column. with cannister double-shotted, the discharge from the four twelve pounders sweeping out half a dozen panels of the fence, and driving a storm of slugs and shotted road on a double-quick, and when discovered were only fifty yards distant. The cannoniers sprang to their pieces, and instantly opened on the approaching column anything of the enemy was cooling his guns, when suddenly his sergeant shouted "Here they come! Here they come!" A rebel brigade was coming down the vicinity. Battery B, Fourth United States Artillery, had lost heavily in the course of the engagement, its commander, Lieutenant Campbell, having been wounded across the field in front of the building, and strewed the ground with their dead. The terrible effect of cannister was never more clearly demonstrated than in this General Hatch, was made upon the rebels posted immediately around the Church. The slaughter here was fearful. Each of the contending lines charged repeatedly General Hooker, on the right of our line, made his assaults, and near it where he received his wound. The attack of King's Division, temporarily commanded by This Church is located on a ridge near Sharpsburg, on the battle-field of Antietam, and suffered severely in that engagement. It was against this point that skill, vigilance, and powerful glasses, every movement of the enemy, reporting them instantly by a few waves of their flags to the Union Commander, and represents the most important of those signal look-outs, and was located on the summit of Elk Mountain, one of the South Mountain Range of the Blue Ridge, and in return, transmitting by the same means the orders to the subordinate generals, which were to check or defeat the manœuvres of the enemy. The adjoining sketch campaigns, has their assistance to a commanding general been more valuable, or more frankly and handsomely acknowledged, than in the momentous struggle on the operations in the field, and especially during a great battle. His signal officers were most intelligently and advantageously posted, and seldom, even in later Antietam. At intervals along our line of battle, and on the most prominent points in the vicinity, were stationed the Federal Signal Officers, detecting by their To the hero of Antietam belongs the credit of first developing and fully appreciating the value of a corps of signalists to an army throughout its active from General McClellan, probably requesting further information in regard to some reported movement of his wary foe, or sending an important order to a Corps The Elk Mountain Signal Station was operated by Lieutenants Pierce and Jerome, and the view was taken whilst the former officer was receiving a dispatch concentrate his force against our weakest points, and counteract the effect of whatever similar movements may have been attempted by us." were launched against the moving columns. It was this information, conveyed by the little flags upon the mountain-top, that no doubt enabled the enemy to front or rear that was not instantly revealed to their keen look-outs; and as soon as the intelligence could be communicated to their batteries below, shot and shell by the Signal Corps of the Union Army: "Their signal stations on the Blue Ridge commanded a view of our every movement. We could not make a maneuvere in A rebel correspondent of a Richmond paper, who claims to have been an eye-witness of that battle, thus writes on the succeeding day, of the part taken in it

DUNKER CHURCH, BATTLE-FIELD OF ANTIETAM, MARYLAND.

Signal Cower, Elh Mountain, Maryland.

SIGNAL TOWER ON ELK MOUNTAIN, MARYLAND,

Bresident Lincoln on the Battle-Field of Antictam

and was met by General McClellan and Staff, who conducted him during that and the following day over the scenes of the recent battle, and in reviewing the various occupied the afternoon in reviewing the forces at that position, and spent the night at General Sumner's quarters. On Thursday morning he recrossed the Potomac, President of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The President reached General Sumner's headquarters, on Bolivar Heights, at Harper's Ferry, on Wednesday, very doubtful if you will find many who will go further." quarters, occupying much of the time in private conversation with him. In this conversation, it is said, that when the President alluded to the complaints that Corps and Divisions of the Army, extending over a space of several miles. Maryland. He was accompanied on his trip by Major General McClernand and Staff, Colonel Lamon, the Marshal of the District of Columbia, and Mr. Garrett, were being made of the slowness of the General's movements, General McClellan replied, "You may find those who will go faster than I, Mr. President: but it is On the 1st of October, 1862, two weeks after the battle of Antietam, President Lincoln visited the Army of the Potomac, encamped near Harper's Ferry, in The evening and night of Thursday and Friday the President spent at General McClellan's train at ten o'clock at night. then proceeded to Frederick, where he was received by the people with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of respect, and reached Washington in a special and described by the General, as he had previously done those of the great battle of Antictam; in all of which the President evinced a deep interest. The President South Mountain, the leading incidents of which, the scenes of particularly desparate conflicts, the names of the Corps and officers engaged, &c., were pointed out On Saturday, the President set out on his return home, accompanied by General McClellan as ar as Middletown, but on the way, riding over the battle-field of

PRESIDENT LINCOLN ON BATTLE-FIELD OF ANTIETAM

Sal Person

EAN TO

Scene in Pleasant Walley, Maryland.

General McClellan's. It was intended that General McClellan should make one of the group, and all the necessary arrangements had been perfected by the photographer. officers of the Staff whiled away many a pleasant October day. Two of the officers shown in this group were members of General Burnside's Staff, and one of when heavy cannonading on the Virginia side of the Potomac, caused by a reconnoitring party of cavalry, drew the General away. McClellan, who paid a brief visit to the army. The General spent much of his time here, when not occupied with military matters, and in the vine-clad porch the The house of Mrs. Lee, situated in Pleasant Valley, Maryland, was selected by General McClellan, after the battle of Antietam, as a temporary home for Mrs.

made friends, and for many a month thereafter the bivouac was enlivened by the memories and recital of the Marylanders' welcome. had time to wait. There were very few of the Army of the Potomac who left Maryland and crossed into Virginia after Lee without regretful partings with new the troops. When the army was on the march, many families stood at their gateways with buckets of water for the thirsty men, and filled the canteens of all who thousands of the friends of the soldiers found their way to camp. The citizens of Maryland were noted for their hospitality to such visitors, and their generosity to heights back of Harper's Ferry. Supplies were forwarded over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which afforded excellent facilities for visiting the army, and of the various departments. A portion of the army was encamped along the base of Maryland Heights and South Mountain, and the remainder was located on the The headquarters were located in a field near this house, and were composed only of a sufficient number of tents to shelter the General and Staff, and the offices

Scene in Pleasant Valley. Maryland.

- Shall

1300 mer, 200

1907-1818

Pontoon Bridge. Across the Potomac of Berlin.

inhabitants, numbering about five hundred, are dependent principally for support upon the business of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, which passes the place, and during the war, from the interruption of navigation necessarily suffered much hardship. The bivouac of the Army of the Potomac in its vicinity in 1862 first June, 1861, when the Confederates sacrificed it to the spirit of destruction that ruined Harper's Ferry and laid waste the pleasant places of the border. Its headquarters after the battle of Antictam, and the troops crossed into Virginia, marching down through Loudon to Rectortown and Warrenton, and thence to introduced its name to the country, and it has fallen again into the partial oblivion that has hidden much more pretentious villages. Here McClellan had his Beaux is a quiet little village on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, twelve miles from Point of Rocks. A fine bridge connected it with the Virginia shore until surrounding scenery. The river at this point is obstructed by scattered rocks, and with the wooded hills that slope precipitously to the water's edge, forms one of finds here a pleasant halting place in his journeyings for recreation the most charming pictures of the Potomac. Game and fish abound, many objects of interest are close at hand, and the summer fugitive from the ills of city life The Photograph only shows the village and a small portion of the Maryland shore, from which no adequate impression can be formed of the beauty of the

Monniber, 18

4-4-108

Barper's Kerry, Pirginia.

has escaped destruction. It is not probable that the armory and arsenals will ever be rebuilt. subsequently destroyed it. Between it and the row of tents, and not far from the hotel, is located the little engine house used as a fort by John Brown, and which compelled a surrender of our forces just before the battle of Antictam. are the Maryland Heights, the natural key to the position. It was here that Col. Ford abandoned his position, and Stonewall Jackson seizing it the next day, warehouses for army stores. Passing between the Potomac and the armory buildings is the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which crosses upon a high bridge to the few tents, located for the post garrison. by the confederates three times since then. Once they captured it with an immense amount of stores, artillery, and ten thousand prisoners. In the foreground are a were saved by the enemy, who subsequently removed the machinery to Richmond and commenced the manufacture of rifles there for the rebel army. It has been held were burned by a small body of artillerymen, who retreated to Carlisle, Pa. Thousands of rifles were burned, but a number of buildings and considerable machinery was to send an officer to seize the armories and arsenals, but orders having been given by the Government to fire them on the approach of any hostile force, they be made by an enemy. First captured by a surprise, John Brown, with seventeen men, held it for nearly three days. When Virginia seceded, the first step taken surrounded by high mountains and impassable ravines, it was supposed that, in locating a National Armory there, that it would be secure against any assault that could years, as Harper's Ferry. Situated at the junction of the Shenandoah and Potomac Rivers, with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad passing through it, and PERHAPS no one point, North or South, has been the scene of so many changes in the shifting panorama of war, through which we have passed in the last four As the Potomac disappears in the distance, it unites with the Shenandoah, which rushes down the gorge by the side of the Loudoun Heights. Upon the left This bridge has been so often destroyed during the last five years, that it is estimated that a million of dollars have been spent in keeping it in In the centre are eight buildings, what were left of the armory, some of which have been roofed in with boards and used as The high brick building at the end of the bridge was a fine hotel, but the confederates

10-05262-50388

What do A Want, John Bency?

I want, John Henry?" that affectionate creature would at once produce the demijohn of "Commissary," as the only appropriate prescription for the occasion that his untutored nature could suggest. When fatigned by long exercise in the saddle, over bottomless roads, or under the glowing Southern sun, John's master would propound the query, "What do quartermaster of headquarters, and took his position as an unmistakable character. seldom rendered, although occasionally expected of camp servants. "Would you like to take service with me?" said the Captain. "Yees, sir," answered John it up. The rare intelligence exhibited in this act naturally made a deep impression, and suggested an unusual capacity for the care of boots and other attentions, "Then follow me to camp." "I can't keep up, sir." "Catch hold of the horse's tail, then." In short, John Henry was installed body servant to Captain H An officer's hat blew off; John raised it, and with a grin (which alarmed the Captain, lest he should be held responsible if the head should fall off.) politely handed originating in a scurrilous picture of that African, drawn by a special artist. In point of fact, he came into notice at Harrison's Landing, in the summer of 1862 A legend was current at headquarters that J. H. had been discovered hanging by his heels to a persimmon tree. It is needless to state that this was a libel he crossed the Red Sea without pontoons, and conducted the children of Israel forty years through the desert without a wagon train. common. His appreciation of Bible history was shown on many occasions. For instance, he always considered Moses the most remarkable of quartermasters, in that Although his head resembled an egg, set up at an angle of forty-five degrees, small end on top, yet his moral and intellectual acquirements were by no means spirits he would appropriate his employer's. As his mind expanded, boots became monotonous, manual labor distasteful, and a dissolution of partnership inevitable The Colonel went to another scene of duty. John Henry remained, whether owing to inducements offered by the Provisional Government is not yet definitely known became a resident of the rebel capital. Here freedom burst upon him in a new light; he formed new associations—principally with the other sex—to raise whose With wisdom such as this he would enlighten his sable compeers. Meanwhile, the Captain became a Colonel. Richmond was evacuated, and John Henry

100

WHAT DO J WANT, JOHN HENRY?

Warrenton, Va., Jovember, 1802

Scouts and Cuides to the Army of the Lotomac.

and when the necessity for their services has ceased to exist, with rare exceptions the brave men are altogether forgotten. Volumes might be written of their after a moment's exposure to the light, enabled the bearer to re-enter our lines, and proceed without delay to headquarters. They generally passed as foragers Army of the Potomac when conducted by Major Allen Pinkerton. Their faces are indexes of the character required for such hazardous work. Men of iron nervo scouts, but none proved more efficient than those of the Army of the Potomac. The individuals in this group were attached to the Secret Service Department of the the Government, and have proved no less faithful servants in peace than when confronting the dangers that surrounded the military spy. prisoners, some of whom were executed, while the survivors, scarcely less fortunate, wasted in cells, long, weary months. A few are still retained in the employ of frequently led to the discovery of the designs of the enemy in time to enable our commanding officers to wholly frustrate them. A number of the scouts were taken within our own lines, always coming in with vegetables, poultry, and the like, and with the enemy assumed such characters as the occasion might require. They the scout fall into his hands. If captured, he could drop this paper, apparently by accident, without exciting suspicion; and if successful in his expedition, the pass preparation that only became visible when exposed to solar rays, and on the back of which was pencilled some unimportant memoranda, to deceive the enemy, should army in front of Fredericksburg, they proved of incalculable value. Each man was provided with a pass from the Commanding General, written with a chemical and indomitable perseverence, they braved the halter with perfect consciousness of their peril, and seldom failed in an undertaking. During the campaign of the heroic deeds, and the historian of the rebellion will have failed in his duty if he neglects to chronicle the instances of their great exploits. Every army had its were really spies, and often The scouts of an army undergo more hardship and brave greater peril than any other class. Secrecy being their only safety, their heroic deeds pass unrecorded spent many days within the Confederate lines. The Union people of the South sheltered them, and furnished information that

SCOUTS AND GUIDES TO THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Berlin, October, In

100000

The Lacy Bouse, Zalmouth, Pringinia.

the city, which is not more than three hundred yards distant, the river being very narrow at this point. The grounds in front of the mansion were terraced down to the with a relative near the Wilderness battle-field after the occupation of the estate by our troops. The view here presented shows the front of the house, looking towards one of the rebel corps commanders during the rebellion; and his young wife, whose rare beauty was only equalled by her spitefulness towards Federal officers, lived spring of 1862, was surrounded with beautiful lawns, rare flowers, and all the exterior adornments of an elegant country seat. The building was erected previous to river bank, and were ascended by means of granite steps, bordered with vines and tropical plants. but three different families, each generation handing it down to the descendents, after the old English custom of inheritance. The owner was a Major on the Staff of the Revolutionary war, and many of the distinguished men of that period have met within its walls. Since that time the property has passed through the hands of THE Lacy House, situated on the banks of the Rappahannock, immediately opposite Fredericksburg, when taken possession of by the United States troops, in the

have been cut down, the gravel walks annihilated, and many years must clapse before the last evidences of war shall have disappeared from the place some of our Generals. A large number of the Union dead are buried near the house, and earthworks for artillery disfigure the adjacent grounds. The shade trees was established here, and suffered considerably from the shells of the enemy, who directed a severe artillery fire against the house, supposing it to be occupied by subsequently occupied the house, and finally it became a sort of depot, for the Christian Commission. At the battle of Fredericksburg, in December, 1862, a hospital General McDowell first used the building as his headquarters, and afterwards General Burnside pitched his tents in the yard. Many of our general officers

LACEY HOUSE, FALMOUTH, YIRGINIA.

Secomber, 200

Areberichsburg, Phyginia.

Monday night, under cover of a pitiless storm of rain and sleet, our troops returned to their camps. the right resting on the Rappahannock, one mile above the city, the lines extending in a semi-circle around the town, to a point three miles below, where the left by the whole army, the Confederates offering no resistance except by occasional shots from their artillery on the heights. afternoon, when a storming party crossed in boats and drove out the riftemen. A small portion of the troops occupied the town that night, and next day was followed throughout the day, with frequent intervals to enable the engineers to resume work, but who were invariably driven off with considerable loss, until late in the sharpshooters opened a severe fire from the houses and rifle pits, which was returned by our artillery, numbering about seventy guns. on the morning of the 11th the pontoon train came down to the river. The engineers had constructed bridges about half way across the stream, when the Confederate troops went into winter quarters, the Confederates, meanwhile fortifying the Predericksburg heights, and rendering the position impregnable to assault. On the without a blow to mar its peaceful beauty. General Augur, in April, 1862, surprised and captured the place, which remained in our possession till the middle of thrilling events of the war. Nestled in a valley of unsurpassed fertility, its people had surrounded their homes with elegance, and enjoyed all that affluence could both armies occupying the same positions taken in the morning. Sunday and Monday passed without anything transpiring except skirmishing along the lines, and night of the 10th of December, the movements for an attack commenced. The artillery was planted along the river bank opposite the city, and about three o'clock campaign, but owing to delay in occupying the heights commanding the city, failed in capturing it, and encamped upon the hills north of the river, where the summer, when Pope's retreat from Cedar Mountain necessitated its abandonment. In November, the Army of the Potomac marched down from the Antietam secure. The citizens were zealous advocates of secession, and, in 1861, the city was made a rendezvous for Confederate troops; but the first year of the war passed Just below the Falls of the Rappahannock, and midway between Washington and Richmond, is the city of Fredericksburg, the scene of some of the most Early on the morning of the 13th, the battle commenced, lasting all day, with fearful loss on our side, and night closing the struggle with The troops were formed for assault, with The bombardment lasted an activity that betokens a brilliant future before the close of the war, and at the termination of hostilities little remained of the city but deserted houses and tottering walls; but now business is resumed with During the Wilderness campaign the city was again occupied by the Union army for a short time. The ruin, commenced in the battle of December, was complete

FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

Jeurump, 180

R. 8 9-7937

Bakkery D. Second Aniked Stakes Arkillery.

of the garrison. Battery D at once took position, with other artillery of the Sixth Corps, out in the fields, near the ruins of the Mansfield House, where Gen. and on his promotion to the command of a New York regiment of volunteers, continued its glorious career under Lieut. Williston, being finally transformed into a artillery in that organization, and Lieutenant, since General, Upton succeeded to the command. Under the latter officer the Battery gained much commendation, and fall upon the rear of the array. On the organization of Franklin's Division, its commander, Captain-now Colonel-Platt, was made chief of a brigade of it-Sedgwick, and Wright. This Battery was present at the first battle of Bull Run, where the enemy got a taste of its mettle, while attempting to turn our extreme left, artillery, and impregnable to attack when lined by the heroes of the Sixth Corps, nobly commanded, as it has always been, by such Generals as Franklin-who organized and were sleeping beneath their frail cover. Better protection was soon afforded by the fine line of earthworks which soon sprung into existence, embrasured for the to the right being a grove of white poplars around the Mansfield House. With characteristic coolness some of the troops had already pitched their little shelter tents, casualties. In line to the rear of the Battery, is the Veteran Vermont Brigade, acting as a support. Further still, is the bank of the river, skirted by the trees; those had just received the order, "cannoniers to your posts," calling to the photographer to hurry his wagon out of the way, unless he was anxious to figure in the list of Bayard was killed, at the time of the first crossing by General Burnside in 1862. This picture was made as the guns were engaging the enemy, the gunners who battle-flag had no space to transcribe them upon horse-battery, and ordered to the cavalry, where it remained to the close of the war, without ever losing a gun, although the list of its actions was so long that its In June, 1863, the Sixth Corps made its third successful crossing of the Rappahannock, storming the works that defended the passage, and making prisoners

BATTERY D. FIFTH D. S. ARTILLERY, IN ACTION, I'REDERICKTURG, VA.

May, Ix

Pontoon Bridges, Across the Rappahannock

commanding the army. Gen. Bayard, of the Cavalry, was killed by a shell in the edge of the little grove represented in the sketch. Pontoons were again laid at this point, with thirty-eight thousand supporting them, but who were not brought into action in consequence of a misinterpretation of the orders of Gen. Burnside, entrenchments hastily thrown up across the plain, until recalled to this side of the river on the night of the 15th. There were seventeen thousand men engaged at Our forces having been driven from the woods, and it being late in the day, no other attack was made on this portion of the line, purpose, but a strong demonstration made on that portion of the line by the enemy with artillery and cavalry, rendered it necessary to throw the whole of Doubleday's to the former, with its right reaching to the outskirts of Fredericksburg. The remainder of the army was formed through the city, extending about one mile above wing of the army, under the command of Gen. Franklin, and composed of the First and Sixth Corps, crossed at this point, one and a half miles below the city, and command against them. position to a certain extent. Gen. Gibbon's division was pushed in on Meade's right to support him, and Gen. Doubleday's division on the left with the same the town, and assaulted the heights. On the 13th the engagement opened on the field represented here, by Gen. Meade's division, which carried the enemy's went into position on the flats in front; the First Corps on the extreme left, with its right extending towards the hills, and the Sixth Corps nearly at right angles Two of the pontoon bridges used at the battle of Fredericksburg in December, 1862, are shown in this sketch. On the 11th and 12th of that month, the left Meade held his position in the woods for some time, but not receiving additional support, was forced by a fierce attack in front to retire. the troops remaining in and to be marching towards the Blue Ridge, for the purpose of invading Pennsylvania this point in June, 1863, and a body of troops thrown across the river to ascertain the movements of the enemy, who was found to have abandoned Fredericksburg

PONTOON BRIDGE ACROSS THE RAPPAHANNOCK

Sept. Com

Battle Word - half

Charnation of Augia Creek.

Spottsylvania, to be sent to Washington; and in nearly all of the operations of the army in Eastern Virginia the place has borne a conspicuous part. The after the Antictam Campaign; and finally during Grant's operations at Spottsylvania. Nearly a hundred steamers have been collected here at one time, while village but smoking embers and half-hurned wharves. Aquia Creek has been used three times as a base of supplies: once for McDowell, in 1862; next for Burnside whole army was in motion, and an immense throng of sutlers and other camp followers collected at Aquia Creek for transportation to Washington. By 10 A. M of no delay, Gen. Hooker, in the afternoon, telegraphed Mr. Lincoln not to come, and immediately made preparations to leave. At daylight, Sunday morning, the same time sheltered in the stream that runs down between the hills, the once notorious iron-clad Page Confederates had formidable batteries on the bluffs which commanded the river previous to our occupation of Fredericksburg in the spring of 1862, and at the sailing vessels anchored in the river nearly obstructed its navigation. The wounded were brought here from Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Wilderness, and A gunboat lay out in the river for the protection of the place until all could get away; but no enemy appeared, and in a short time nothing remained of the busy All of the supplies had been removed from the buildings, and the latter, erected at great expense by the Quartermaster's Department, were committed to the flames anchored in the stream were locked together for the transportation of the cars on the wharf, and were towed to Washington by the steamers loaded with passengers laden with stores, wagons, &c., and the evacuation was attended with scenes that would have been regarded as ridiculous but for the general alarm. The barges follow up the army as it passed the landing on its march to Washington, crowded on to the boats in the greatest confusion. The steamers were already heavily the camps between this point and Fredericksburg were all deserted, and the civilians, in constant apprehension of an attack from the Confederate cavalry that might commenced on Saturday morning. The President was expected to visited the army on that day, but the advance of the Confederates into Pennsylvania admitting before Fredericksburg, fifteen miles distant, and had used this point and Belle Plain, a similar landing, seven miles below, as a base of supplies. Thus sketch was taken a few hours previous to the abandonment of Aquia Creek in June, 1863. The Army of the Potomac was along the Rappahannock into oblivion, except as connected with the military operations of the great rebellion Fever and ague prevail during the summer, forbidding the growth of a village, and with the completion of the railroad to Alexandria, the place will doubtless sink The landing is now used by the Washington, Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad Company, but will probably never be more than an ordinary station the refuge of the Blue Ridge. not without serious loss to our side, as well as to the enemy-a day or two after, Pleasanton attacked and drove them fifteen miles across the country, to upper end of the Bull Run range of hills, in Loudoun County, in and around the village of Aldie. The rebels were driven, and our eavalry left masters of the field friends in the cavalry, as one might go off for a day's shooting. The fight in which they were taken, was hotly contested, and took place at the foot of the recruits or conscripts, although their appearance laid them open to the charge (often made during the war) of being irregulars, out for a day's amusement, with their grey jacket and trowsers, and drab felt hat usually worn by the rebel cavalry; some, however, show no change from the ordinary clothes of a civilian, being probably These were a batch of rebel cavalrymen, captured in the battle of Aldie, by the troops under Gen. Pleasanton. The majority of them are dressed in the dusty Generals Buford and Gregg, ably leading their divisions in the fight.

Confederate Prisoners af Fairfax Court-Youse, Wirginia.

the noble chain of the Blue Ridge, dividing Loudoun from the Shenandoah Valley. The country around Aldie is very charming, very much diversified with hill, wood and valley, fine farms, pretty brooks-with stone bridges-and beyond all.

Gettysburg. Pennsylvania.

than any other business. A number of copper mines have been opened in the neighborhood, and worked with considerable success. The town numbers about four are handsome and commodious; and the private residences are all built in a neat and substantial manner. The town has a flourishing Lutheran Theological one hundred and fourteen miles west of the former city. It stands on elevated ground, in the midst of a fertile farming country. The Court-House and public offices thousand inhabitants. Seminary, with a library of about ten thousand volumes; and is also the seat of Pennsylvania College. The manufacture of carriages is carried on to a greater extent GETTYSBURG, the scene of Lee's defeat in 1863, is a post borough and capital of Adams county, Pennsylvania, on the turnpike from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, covered with indentations of musket balls. their most terrible assaults in the last day's fight. The town suffered considerably from the fire of our artillery, and the houses in some parts of the place were Ridge, where General Reynolds was killed. This view is taken from Cemetery Ridge, where our artillery was massed, and against which the Confederates directed It was back of this place that the Federal cavalry first met the Confederate infantry, on the 1st of July, 1863, and on the left of the picture can be seen Seminary Very few of the inhabitants were injured, however, most of them taking refuge in their cellars and other sheltered places.

although many of the former were already interred—strewed the now quiet fighting ground, soaked by the rain, which for two days had drenched the country with broken army. Through the shadowy vapors, it was, indeed, a "harvest of death" that was presented; hundreds and thousands of torn Union and robel soldiers— SLOWLY, over the misty fields of Gettysburg—as all reluctant to expose their ghastly horrors to the light—came the sunless morn, after the retreat by Lee's unknown by strangers, and in a strange land. Killed in the frantic efforts to break the steady lines of an army of patriots, whose heroism only excelled theirs in represented in the photograph are without shoes. These were always removed from the feet of the dead on account of the pressing need of the survivors. The pockets of men torn in pieces by the savage wantonness of fiends. Swept down without preparation, the shattered bodies fall in all conceivable positions. motive, they paid with life the price of their treason, and when the wicked strife was finished, found nameless graves, far from home and kindred. ammunifion, rags, cups and canteens, crackers, haversacks, &c., and letters that may tell the name of the owner, although the majority will surely be buried turned inside out also show that appropriation did not cease with the coverings of the feet. Around is scattered the litter of the battle-field, accountrements, A battle has been often the subject of elaborate description; but it can be described in one simple word, devilish! and the distorted dead recall the ancient legends The rebels aid in preventing such another calamity falling upon the nation Such a picture conveys a useful moral: It shows the blank horror and reality of war, in opposition to its pageantry. Here are the dreadful details! Let them

Field sulieve Censeral Reynolds Zell, Battle-Piells of Cettyschurg.

short time, re-formed their lines, and prepared to charge, which was met by a severe fire from the advance of our infantry, which went into line as rapidly as the available line of defence beyond Gettysburg, when, at eleven o'clock, General Reynolds arrived with the 1st corps on a double-quick. The enemy then halted for a dismounted, and by slowly falling back from one stone wall to another, impeded the progress of the enemy very materially. The cavalry had just taken up the last our cavalry, was captured, not a man escaping. The Confederates immediately threw a division of infantry into line, and advanced upon our cavalry, which road to Chambersburg. The rebel infantry was preceded by a small body of their cavalry, which dispersed the militia wherever met with, and which, charging into by the rest of our army, and became the battle-ground of the succeeding days. which lasted until night, our troops, overwhelmed by numbers, slowly falling back, and finally taking a position on Cemetery Ridge, which was next day occupied the troops, and while engaged in this work, received a shot in the neck, falling lifeless to the earth. His remains were brought off the field under a withering fire, regiments could be brought up. General Reynolds, appreciating the importance of holding the Seminary Ridge, rode out into the field, and directed the posting of ABOUT nine o'clock on the morning of the 1st of July, 1863, the Federal cavalry, under General Buford, met the Confederates two miles beyond Gettysburg, on the

the bodies such an appearance of life that a spectator could hardly help thinking they were about to rise to continue the fight grasping their muskets. In some instances the cartridge remained between the teeth, or the musket was held in one hand, and the other was uplifted as though to with those who wore a calm and resigned expression, as though they had passed away in the act of prayer. Others had a smile on their faces, and looked as if they the fields. Some of the dead presented an aspect which showed that they had suffered severely just previous to dissolution, but these were few in number compared ward a blow, or appealing to heaven. The faces of all were pale, as though cut in marble, and as the wind swept across the battle-field it waved the hair, and gave The dead shown in the photograph were our own men. The picture represents only a single spot on the long line of killed, which after the fight extended across Some lay stretched on their backs, as if friendly hands had prepared them for burial. Some were still resting on one knee, their hands thousand men, suddenly emerged from the woods into the open fields on our flank, and moved rapidly down upon Round Top, the occupation of which must inevitably with his left exposed, and the approach to the ridge entirely open to a flank movement. While the battle was raging fiercest in front, Longstreet, with fifteen our officers at the signal station excessively. Sickles, with the Third Corps, had opened the fight in the afternoon, considerably advanced in front of this position, stationed General Warren, Chief Engineer of the Army of the Potomac, with a signal officer, for the purpose of communicating to the commanding General the day's fight, the Confederates under Longstreet repeatedly and so impetuously dashed. This position is on a steep ridge known as Little Round Top, on which was The sketch represents a portion of the breastworks on the left of our line at Gettysburg, occupied by the Fifth and Sixth Corps, and against which, in the second In front and to the left open fields stretched away, with here and there a small grove, which afforded shelter to sharpshooters, who annoyed lines, which, though frequently repulsed, finally rested in triumph at the front never neglecting thus to protect themselves from the withering fire of the enemy. When night closed upon the field, these breastworks were stretched along like thrown up, and after a brief interval the fight was renewed. Each change in the lines, by the fluctuations of battle, was marked by defences of stone, our troops disorder down the slope to the shelter of the groves and stonewalls in the fields. the first volley, our whole line charged with the bayonet, struggled with the enemy for a moment breast to breast, and then, with shouts and cheers, drove him in sides of the ridge, when the tramp of the Fifth Corps, on the double quick, was suddenly heard coming up through the woods to the rescue, and in a moment our to Sickles for some of his troops, but he could spare none, and another officer was hurried off to bring up any command that could be found, while the enemy still winrows marking the shifting tide of the struggle, between which the dead lay in countless numbers, and to-day the visitor traces by them, the steps of our advancing colors flashed out from the foliage. Both armies reached the crest at the same time, the battle opened like a thunder-clap, and raged with terrific fierceness. After pressed nearer, threatening to overwhelm us. Sickles' left was turned, his Corps pressed slowly back, and the Confederates commenced clambering up the rocky General Warren sent an aid to General Meade for a corps from the right, but the commanding General could not be found. A second staff officer was sent down Breastworks of stones and timber, shattered by the shells, were instantaneously decided the battle, and was practically the end of the fight." Here President Lincoln attended the consecration of the Soldiers' National Monument, erected to thirty or forty colors, and some four thousand or five thousand prisoners, with great loss to the enemy in killed and wounded. of the enemy was met by about six small brigades of our troops, and was finally repulsed after a terrific contest at very close quarters, in which our troops took about which fired from Round Top to Cemetery Hill at the enemy, all the way, as they advanced, whenever they had the opportunity. Those were the troops that really met the which, I have no doubt, was their intention. They attacked with wonderful spirit; nothing could have been more spirited connonade continued for probably an hour and a half. The enemy then made an assault at the end of that time; it was a very formidable assault, and made, I cannonade from 120 pieces of artillery on the front of the line connecting Cemetery Ridge with Round Top. Gen. Hancock, in one of his reports, says: "That the memory of the heroic men who fell in that struggle. Second and Third Divisions of the Second Corps, and these were the troops, assisted by a small brigade of Vermont troops, together with the artillery of our line, should judge, with about 18,000 infantry. When the columns of the enemy appeared, it looked as if they were going to attack the centre of our line, but after utmost rigor of the law." The third day's fight was in front of this spot, and was commenced about one o'clock in the afternoon by the enemy opening a at the conclusion of the fight there still remained, as if in mockery, the notice, "All persons found using fire-arms in these grounds will be prosecuted with the confidently hope shall never be again blasted by war. marching straight out a little distance they seemed to incline a little to their left, as if their object was to march through my command and seize Cemetery Hill, monuments, very few of which were injured, notwithstanding the terrible nature of the conflict. The shrubbery was badly broken, and the fence swept away, but was made, and on which is situated the National Soldiers' Cemetery. The original cemetery was a very handsome enclosure, and contained many elegant CEMETERY RIDGE was the scene of some of the severest fighting at Gettysburg. The knoll shown in the sketch is that upon which the last assault of the enemy No doubt there were other troops that fired a little, but those were the troops that really withstood the shock of the assault and repulsed it. The attack The shattered trees and crushed flowers have all been replaced by others, whose beauty and fragrance we may The repulse was a most signal one, and that The shock of the assault fell upon the

FIELD WHERE GENERAL REYNOLDS FELL, GETTYSBURG

TOAIN Z'

Anterior Piese at Brenskinarlis on Round Gap, Cettysburg. /

Catebray of Cemetery, Gettysburg.

GATEWAY OF CEMETERY GETTYSBURG

A Sharpshaater's Last Skep. v

sometimes many hours would elapse before either party could get a favorable shot. to kill the other. Hats would be elevated upon sticks, and powder flashel on a piece of paper, to draw the opponent's fire, not always with success, however, and sharpshooters frequently secreted themselves so as to defy discovery, and picked off officers without the Confederate riflemen being able to return the fire wounded. Others secreted themselves behind logs and rocks, and not a few dug little pits, into which they crept, lying close to the ground and rendering it almost but were taken to the front and allowed to choose their own positions. Some climbed into bushy trees, and lashed themselves to the branches to avoid falling if then the visitor to a battle-field finds the bones of some man shot as this one was, but there are hun lieds that will never be known of, and will moulder into nothingness permanent position from which to annoy the enemy. How many skeletons of such men are bleaching to-day in out of the way places no one can tell. Now and bullet. His cap and gun were evidently thrown behind him by the violence of the shock, and the blanket, partly shown, indicates that he had selected this as a hands of the riflemen. among the rocks. There were several regiments of Sharpshooters employed on both sides during the war, and many distinguished officers lost their lives at the A burial party, searching for dead on the borders of the Gettysburg hattle-field, found, in a seehuled spot, a sharpshooter lying as he fell when struck by the Some of the regiments tried almost every variety of arms, but generally found the Western rifle most effective. The first regiment was composed of men selected from each of the Loyal States, who brought their own rifles, and could snuff a candle at a Occasionally a Federal and Confederate Sharpshooter would be brought face to face, when each would resort to every artifice When the armies were entrenched, as at Vicksburg and Richmond, the The men were seldom used in line as the field of carnage faded before him? What visions, of loved ones far away, may have hovered above his stony pillow! What familiar voices may he not have clothing shows that his sufferings must have been intense. Was he delirious with agony, or did death come slowly to his relief, while memories of home grew dearer over him, and had laid down upon his blanket to await death. There was no means of judging how long he had lived after receiving his wound, but the disordered as if just recovering from an attack of geological small-pox. The sharpshooter had evidently been wounded in the head by a fragment of shell which had exploded sharpshooters and infantry had endeavored to dislodge him. The trees in the vicinity were splintered, and their branches cut off, while the front of the wall looked which he had directed his shots, and, in comparative security, picked off our officers. The side of the rock on the left shows, by the little white spots, how our rebel sharpshooter, and photographed the scene presented here. The Confederate soldier had built up between two huge rocks, a stone wall, from the crovices of wrecked caissons, and the debris of a broken army. The artist, in passing over the scene of the previous days' engagements, found in a lonely place the covert of a on our right, to the forests that stretched away from Round Top, on the left, the fields were thickly strewn with Confederate dead and wounded, dismounted guns, heard, like whispers beneath the roar of battle, as his eyes grew heavy in their long, last sleep! On the Fourth of July, 1863, Lee's shattered army withdrew from Gettyshurg, and started on its retreat from Pennsylvania to the Potomac. From Culp's Hill, four months before. None of those who went up and down the fields to bury the fallen, had found him. home, and some mother may yet be patiently watching for the return of her boy, whose bones lie bleaching, unrecognized and alone, between the rocks at rusted by many storms, still leaned against the rock, and the skeleton of the soldier lay undisturbed within the mouldering uniform, as did the cold form of the dead On the nineteenth of November, the artist attended the consecration of the Gettysburg Cemetery, and again visited the "Sharpshooter's Home." "Missing," was all that could have been known of him at The musket, indicate the terrific character of the fight. General Sickles had discovered early in the day that the enemy were moving around on our left, and advanced his corps on the second day's fight, and it was in this immediate vicinity that he received his wound, from which he lost his limb. The dead horses about the building and perhaps resulted in its total defeat. engaged, losing many valuable officers, but finally repulsing the enemy, and holding a position, the loss of which would have necessitated the retreat of our army, had forced back the left of our lines, and undoubtedly would have gained possession of Round Top, but for the timely arrival of the Fifth Corps, which became hotly overwhelming the Third Corps. At five o'clock General Birney assumed command of the corps, General Sickles having been wounded. In the meantime, the rebels some distance, for the purpose of securing a favorable position. The battle opened about half-past three, the enemy moving down in three lines, and almost Thus House is in front of the left of the position occupied by our army at the battle of Gettysburg. General Sickles established his headquarters near this House accoutrements, still show where the lines of battle were engaged. scarred by bullets, marks of cannon-shot and shell disfigure the buildings, and the remains of the hastily constructed breastworks, with mouldering fragments of Thousands of dead and wounded were strewn over the fields adjacent to this House, and graves of Confederates can be found in every direction. The trees are different roads towards Harrisburg, with orders to attack the enemy wherever he might be found. On the first of July, Reynolds, with the First Corps, engaged the the General and staff pushed on to Gettysburg, establishing headquarters at this house. The second of July was one of the most lovely days of the season, and, the other Corps to march for the scene of action. The headquarters camp was struck, tents and wagons were sent back to Westminster, and shortly after midnight Confederates at Gettysburg, and after a gallant struggle, in which that officer was killed, the Corps, reinforced by the Eleventh, retired to the strong position through the building in quick succession, and made sad havoc with the group about it. In a few minutes a number were killed, and the General was soon compelled Third Corps, was attacked by the enemy, and the battle finally became general, the First, Fifth, Sixth and Eleventh participating, with the Second and Twelfth in the shade about the house, or slept on the green turf, gathering strength for the conflict momentarily expected to commence. In the afternoon, Sickles, with the day presented a most animated appearance. Commanding officers and couriers were constantly arriving and departing, while the staff officers and escort lounged in with the exception of occasional shots between the advanced picket lines, remained perfectly quiet until three o'clock. annihilate it. Immediately after the battle, the owner returned, repaired the damages, and the building now promises to stand for many years, bearing the scars of withdraw, leaving dead and struggling horses on every side. On the third day the house was exposed to even a more severe fire, which threatened to utterly Just back of the cemetery at Gettysburg, on the road leading to Taneytown, stands a humble dwelling, made historical by its occupation as headquarters of General Meade first heard of the engagement and its result at Taneytown, ten miles away, about sundown. Orders were at once despatched for This officer having assumed command of the Army of the Potomac at Frederick, thirty miles distant, immediately sent out the several Corps on The headquarters, from its exposed position, at once became the centre of a terrible artillery fire. Shot and shell plunged The headquarters, however, throughout the Mead-Quarters Major General George G. Meade.

1 WING

Che Pome of a Rebel Sharpshooker. Gekkysburg.

Trossel's Jouse, Battle-Keilh at Gettysburg.

Pendynarkers Army of the Potomar during the Battle of Geffysburg.

C- BP/84-40491

Slangliter Ben, Buttle-Kield of Gettigsburg.

or Gen. Bonham, composed of Georgia troops; they attacked them, capturing 260 prisoners, the battle-flag of the 15th Georgia, re-taking nearly all the ground ground towards the hills upon which we stood. I ordered an immediate charge upon the enemy by the whole division. The division moved forward at once. Two ground was found in many places to be almost covered with the dead and wounded. This sketch only represents a few of the dead, the wounded having been We permanently held that line. Hood's division was driven off nearly a mile." that had been lost, and over 7,000 stand of arms, besides one 12-pound Napoleon gun and three caissons, and all the wounded, who had lain entirely uncared for then formed a line, and directed it to cross the wheat field and clear the woods. In doing this, they came upon a brigade of Hood's division, under Gen. Anderson on a ridge beyond the wheat field opened, with grape and canister. and of that movement says: "I directed the command at once to advance. Hardly had the men unmasked from the hill before a battery of the enemy, stationed and over the wheat field, to the ridge beyond. The line was there permanently established." On Friday afternoon, he was ordered to clear the woods in his front of which there was a short struggle, and at which two regiments which had been massed on the flanks of the line, were deployed, drove the enemy through the woods, volleys were fired, when the whole command started at a double-quick. We met the enemy in the low ground, drove them back to the stone wall, for the possession across this wheat field, having driven everything before them. Their line of skirmishers had crossed the stone wall, and their column was coming across the low A wheat field lay between two masses of woods directly in my front. A stone wall skirted these woods from right to left. The enemy, in masses, were coming direction; some of them rushed through my lines. The plain in front was covered with the flying men. The regular division had marched out past my left flank says: "I heard the cheers of the enemy, and looking in front across a low ground, I saw our men retreating in confusion; fugitives were flying across in every support Barnes' Division, and the scenes which transpired cannot be better described than in his own words before the Committee on the Conduct of the War. He removed to the hospitals. Gen. Crawford, commanding the Third Division of the Fifth Corps, was placed near this ravine, on the second day of the fight, to A portion of the battle-field of Gettysburg, located in front of Little Round Top, is known as the Slaughter Pen. Upon the conclusion of that engagement, the As soon as the skirmishers opened fire on the cannoniers, the battery limbered up and fled. I proceeding to a review of the Second Corps, rode so fearlessly over the fields, and under his frank smile, so well hid all traces of bodily suffering, that the General expedition in the inclement weather of February, was disinclined to give him permission; but Dahlgren, determined on his purpose, mounted his horse, and reluctantly permitted him to depart. After the review, when he came over (for the retirement it offered) to the writer's tent, it was too evident how fearful had been need be told how false was the document, claimed to have been found upon his person. General Meade, suspecting his inability to undergo the fatigues of an pining under the cruelties of Libby and Belle Isle. No ruthless raid was his, but a Christian effort to help the despairing Union Prisoners. None, who knew him. recovering from the loss of his leg, and suffering acutely from any physical exertion, his active spirit could not be controlled, when he thought of his brothers in arms writer narrowly escaped being a witness, having been invited to accompany the Colonel on that ill-starred expedition by which his life was sacrificed. Just is the hardest to realize. The story of his short but brilliant career has been written by abler hands, and is now a "household word." Of its closing scenes, the the Chevalier Bayard, and like him, he was truly "sans peur et sans reproche." So noble a man, that of all the heroes who have perished for the nation, his loss then a Captain on the Staff of General Meade. Handsome, chivalric, one of the bravest of the brave, his character was fitly compared to that of the good knight, A group at the headquarters, near Pairfax Court-House, taken in June, 1863. Thoughtful and erect, the most prominent figure is Colonel Ulric Dahlgren.

SLAUGHTER PEN. FOOT OF ROUND JOP, GETTYSBURG.

Studying the Art of Mar.

excavated, under a continual and heavy fire, the canal on the James, called Dutch Gap. The perils of that undertaking he faithfully shared, from first to last, time that General first commanded a brigade, until the battle of Gettysburg. In that action the Colonel was hit in the arm with a link of a chain, thrown with him acceptable everywhere. He was probably as well known as any officer in the field and Meade. A very reliable soldier, and one of the best Aids on the Staff, his genial disposition, unfailing amiability, and keen appreciation of humor, made Rosencranz, a Swedish officer, on leave of absence, and occupying successively the position of Personal Aid upon the Staff of Generals McClellan, Burnside, Hooker, doing much, by his cheerful bearing and example, to support his troops in their perilous work. army, then on a visit to this country. On the left is the figure of Major Ludlow, since better known as the General in Command of the Colored Brigade, which other misiles from a rebel shell. On the recovery of his wound he retired from the service. The gentleman in foreign uniform is Count Zeppalin, of the Prussian The officer upon the ground, wearing a straw hat, is Lieutenant-Colonel Dickinson, Assistant Adjutant General to General Hooker, a position he held from the The last of the group is Lieutenant (since Lieutenant Colonel)

No. 45

STUDYING THE ART OF WAR.

Fairfax Court-House, June, 1

881-4-4171A =

Probost Marshal's Office. Appin Creeh. Printer of 1862-9.

Creek, done by a small flotilla under command of Capt. Ward, U. S. N., whose flag-ship was a N. Y. towboat, turned into a gunboat, and called the Freeborn The buildings were fired by shells, the enemy keeping up a lively fire also from a battery upon the hill and a small redoubt on the shore One of the first operations of the war (upon the Potomac) was the destruction of the wharf and depot of the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad at Aquia an instance of the variety of character, the writer has seen upon that dock, not only specimens of almost every European race, Africans and Indians, but Chinamen. were open; to go back to the front till next morning, or remain and study character on the wharf, boarding at the sutler's, and trusting to luck for a bed. As vised, the end of the dock would be only reached in time to see the steamer moving swiftly down the creek to the Potomac. of cars from the front and the departure of the Washington boat; nor how often, after successfully elbowing a way in the motley crowd, and getting the pass upon the railroad track, the Provost Marshal's Office. To this office came daily crowds of applicants for passes; officers on welcome leave of absence; soldiers with dressed in army blue, and to all appearance good soldiers lying in hospital grave-yard, for removal; sick and wounded for hospital treatment; and last, though not least, ubiquitous members of the press, constantly going and quarters) paid by the Quartermaster's Department; all kinds of petty traders; visitors to the army; friends seeking the bodies of relatives slain in battle, or hard-carned furloughs; sutlers and their clerks; negroes, anxious to get up to Washington to spend the generous wages (twenty-five dollars a month, besides rations at Falmouth; the wharf was rebuilt, greatly enlarged and improved, and quite a town of hastily but well-constructed buildings put up; among them, and close When the rebels gave up the blockade of the Potomac, quite a chain of works existed here. In the winter of 1862 it became the base of supplies for the army Soldiers or citizens who had business with the army in those days will not readily forget how limited was the time between the arrival of the long train On such occasions two alternatives overgrown it, and situated in a grove, on an eminence, known as Rockhill. Not far from it is the residence of Col. Murray, a much older place, with no pretensions Cavalry would make the stone walls ring to its martial music canvas homes. At night, the green lamps, that showed the position of the General's camp, would shine mysteriously over the trees, and the hand of the Sixth U.S. the pleasant slopes, near the latter house; at the same time, Gen. Pleasonton, commanding the cavalry, had his camp on Rockhill, his tents forming, with Castle to architecture, but withal a roomy, comfortable farm house, with many fine trees around it. In the Fall of 1863, Army Headquarters were pitched, for some days, on the nearest place to Dr. Murray's house, called the Castle, a picturesque grey stone edifice, beautifully contrasting with the dark green ivy, which has partly Murray, a very effective picture; heightened, when of an evening the slanting sun, beaming through the trees, gilded the General's banner, and tinged rosily the Ox the Warrenton Railroad, is a spot known as Three Mile Station; there are no depot buildings, but for all that it is recognized as a stopping place, and is down upon it, and Grant in the Wilderness, shook its spires with the roar of his guns. The altars of its churches are stained with heroic blood; all along its highways slumber those whose names can never pass away, and in the vacant camp-grounds cluster recollections fast blending into traditions, that shall grow dearer dead sounded continually over its new-made graves. History weaves a garment about it more glorious than romance. The pulsations of battle at Bull Run, and alternately occupied it, and cavalry repeatedly fought about it, till the village, once the pride of its district, became a ruin, and the fruitful fields an area of desolation Rapyahannock, and Brandy Station; at Chancellorsville, Bristoe, and Groveton, have throbbed through its streets. Cedar Mountain, blazing with conflict, looked Reviews, with all their "pomp and circumstance," made brilliant days for its memories, and weeks are numbered in the sorrowful periods when the requiem for the injuries were received in General Pope's retreat from the Rapidan, when many of its buildings were destroyed, and nearly all stripped of their contents. Both armies surrounding country was very productive, and after the establishment of railroad communication, the place rapidly grew in size and importance. Its first serious THE village of Culpeper is situated on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, about seventy-five miles from Washington. Sheltered by the Blue Ridge, the fairest plains of Virginia. Imbued with new incentives, her returning people are making pleasant places of their homes, and launching into the enterprises of a brighter dawn, promise for themselves a future prosperity that shall prove more than compensation for troubles past drawing her mantle over the deserts that mankind may make. Already Culpeper has commenced a new adornment, and must soon resume her station, Queen of the Another year, and peace will have hidden the sears that now so sadly mar its beauty. Nature cannot be wholly defrauded of her blossoms, or prevented from command to brigade headquarters. There the mails of the different regiments were placed in one pouch, and sent up to division headquarters, and thence to corps of the army, its welfare was regarded as almost of as much importance as any other department. Each regiment had a post boy, who carried the letters of his Point. As the mails passed to and from the army daily, the work required a large number of men, nearly all of whom were private soldiers detailed for such duty. going through by rail and steamer to the General Post-Office at Washington. During the Petersburg campaign the mails going North were consolidated at City encamped around Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, the corps mail agents delivered their mails to the headquarters agent at Falmouth station, the latter agent headquarters, where mail agents received them and delivered them at the principal depot of the army, to the agent from General Headquarters. When the army was The Post-Office at the Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac was a great institution. Thousands of letters passed through it every week, and in the movements army pouches, one of which was kept for every corps, and detached command of the army times, however, the mails would accumulate in the office at Washington, necessitating a delay of several days before they could be assorted and placed in the several was this department conducted, under the supervision of Wm. B. Haslett, Postmaster, that a letter which left Boston on the morning of the first of the month, march were packed away in the bottom of an army wagon, one being sufficient to carry the whole establishment, including the tent and its furniture. So systematically reaching Washington on the night of the second, would generally be delivered to the private soldier in the trenches at Petersburg on the night of the fourth. At The photograph shows the tent used by the Post-Office Department at General Headquarters. The cases for the letters were made of rough boards, which on a

PR144-10-414

Castle Muray, near Auburn Virginia.

Enlysper, Pirginia.

R517-7937

General Post-Affice, Army of the Lokamac.

The Balt.

Quartermaster of the Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac, and has dovbtless ridden forward to the position selected for camp, to examine its capabilities, and is nothing particular in the picture to account for this little halt, but those who recognize the officer, may possibly give a shrewd guess at his reasons. He is the await the arrival of his wagon-train, in order to personally superintend the pitching of the tents, and the parking of the wagons accepts the opportunity to rest, evidently affording an object of critical admiration to his master, whose orderly meanwhile keeps an eye about the vicinity. There that, the lounger in the grass wisely contented himself with the pleasures of the weed. His good war-steed, in condition highly creditable to the groom, patiently "Chares and Cognac, with these we bivouac," says the old song, but as Cognac was, in the army, a questionable fluid, to say the least of it, and scarce at Richmond, kept the young Colonel always upon his mettle. Corps, one of the most arduous posts of duty in the service, and one whose necessities during the severe campaigns up the Shenandoah Valley, and in the vicinity of To still further satisfy curiosity, it may be mentioned that the reclining officer is Captain Harry Page, since Colonel and Chief Quartermaster of the Cavalry

